
FEWER SUMMER JOBS FOR LAW STUDENTS

Second year law students attending the William S. Boyd School of Law at UNLV can expect few summer internships in Nevada this summer, writes the Northern Nevada Business Weekly. The trend appears to be concentrated in northern Nevada where smaller to mid-sized firms in Reno and Carson City, in many cases, are just not hiring this summer. Summer programs are traditionally gateways to securing employment post-graduation and allow firms and students the chance to see if they are the right fit for each other. The piece sees the local trend as a reflection of the summer employment market for law students across the country. According to the National Association of Law Placement, there will be fewer jobs this year than seen at the start of the recession, less than half the level than two years prior. Less summer employment increases the likelihood of few jobs for graduates as well.
