

BEST RESUME DISTRIBUTION SERVICE - HOW TO FIND THE BEST PLACE TO SUBMIT YOUR RESUME

What is a resume distribution service? How is it any different (if at all) from a simple job search service?

When you submit your resume online, the website's comprehensive algorithm segregates the similar resumes and keeps them under a 'group'. Now, from this pre-defined group, applications and resumes are automatically placed in order of their relevance to the information on vacant job positions that they had received. Quite similar to general search engine's result page, the most relevant results are displayed at the top followed by a decreasing order of relevance/importance.

Therefore it becomes utmost essential to have a good formatted resume that survives the tough filters of good job search sites. Needless to mention, your resume must have keywords at the right intervals and as that shall be deemed fit by the website's algorithm and filters. This is all what happens on a typical job search site when you post your resume.

Now, a resume distribution works initially on the same model but slowly diverges out with the groups it created and thus enabling your resume to reach the most suitable employer. Best resume spider services use the services of a so-called spider or bot that crawls over the data on the servers and 'flags' the most suited resumes. These flags then are grouped and sent messages (updates) on the latest vacancies that may have surfaced. The top job search sites use such comprehensive algorithms to crawl and search for the best resumes available on their database. A simple job search result on the other hand will also include many unwanted (and sometimes irrelevant) results as well!

The importance of User Comments and Feedback

For searching for the best resume distribution service, make use of the comments and feedbacks that the users might have posted on the site. It will give you an insight on success rate of the website that you might be trying to submit a resume to. Also look for websites that seek to convey quite comprehensive information on the resume forwarded to the company that may have 'selected' a candidate. Therefore it is important that you keep your online profile(s) updated always. Sign up but never share too much of personal information lest you might be flooded with unwanted spam mails (that seek to promote their products). Even if you do share an e-mail id on a job search website, try to avoid any mention of the professional e-mail that you might have created recently. Like a true professional, keep the work emails different from the other informal ones.

Therefore have two or more email ids and share them according to the importance of the website on which that is shared.

And lastly, it is completely your discretion on the site that you might select for using its resume distribution services. Take your pick!
