EXECUTIVE SEARCH CONSULTANTS

These individual's line of work is, quite literally, finding work for other professionals. Generally speaking, an executive search consultant will specialize in a particular field, often capitalizing on professional contacts which they have made in the industry. Often, a consultant who deals with executive search duties will have spent a considerable amount of time in a particular industry and have developed both an extensive network of contacts as well as an expertise in the field which prepares them to find the right opportunities for their clients. As you would expect from the name, executive search consulting work generally deals with finding job placements for senior level personnel, though there are also consultants who work with mid career professionals as well as entry level candidates; though typically, these professionals are largely in the business of working on the behalf of more experienced individuals. Many larger executive search firms either deal with candidates of all experience levels or have different divisions within the company which are responsible for assisting entry level, junior and mid-level candidates, though there are some which work solely with senior (even solely with C-level) placements. Becoming An Executive Search Professional If you're interested in becoming involved in the executive search field, it is important to note that it is extremely helpful to specialize in a particular industry and to have a history of experience in this field which has enabled you to develop contacts with companies where you could find placements for executive-level clients in search of work. Without this, it can be a little more difficult to break into the field. Of course, it can be and has been done before; all it takes is an ability to communicate well and to make a strong case for your executive search services and the talents and experience of the clients you represent. There is another option for those who would like to become executive search consultants: seeking a position at an executive consulting firm. In general, these firms look for experience in the area of human resources, especially relating to recruitment and retention, though a previous position where you had experience in making decisions about new hires may be enough to get your foot in the door. Obviously, the more senior level the personnel you have interviewed and otherwise dealt with as a hiring manager or human resources staff member, the more applicable this experience will be to the demands of a position as an executive recruiter. Working With Executive Search Firms To Find Employment Then there is the other side of the coin: seeking senior level employment through the services of an executive search firm. Especially in the current economic climate, there are a large number of executives in search of new opportunities, either due to layoffs as a result of the recent economic turmoil, in search of a position with more security and stability or simply in order to find a more personally and financially rewarding opportunity with another employer. This has caused an increase in the demand for executive search consulting firms (as well as for qualified executive recruiting personnel within these firms) and for many professionals, working with one of these companies is a better way to land a new executive job than searching on their own; the contacts and industry experience of a consultant who specializes in executive search can be very helpful in this regard. Often, the process of seeking a new employment opportunity is much less time consuming when the candidate has an executive recruiter looking for them; and of course, we'd all rather spend less time sending out resumes and more time actually interviewing for suitable positions. Whether you're looking for work in an executive capacity or for a position as an executive recruiter, this is a time where there are a great many opportunities for job seekers in any field. Even though times may seem tough right now, there are more jobs out there than many people would suppose and the right one for you is indeed out there - it's all about knowing how to look and just as importantly, where to begin your search.
