

GETTING A BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF THE HIGH-TECH JOB MARKET

Summary: Learn how to better understand the high-tech job market in this article.

Question: I'm currently an attorney in private practice and was also a CPA for a time. I'm now interested in joining the high-tech industry. I'm looking for a position in Colorado, Oregon or North Carolina, but I'm having a hard time getting a good sense of the job market in those states. I've contacted local chambers of commerce, and I monitor jobs through the internet. Do you have any suggestions on how I can get a better understanding of the job market in a distant city?

Answer: Long-distance job hunting is a challenge, but it's especially tough for career changers. Not only do you have to identify challenging opportunities, but you have to convince hiring managers that you're the best choice, even though you've never held that type of job before. You mentioned monitoring jobs on the internet, which is a great start, but I'd focus on employment resources within each of your target cities. Visit Granted.com to find jobs in Denver, Portland, and Charlotte or Greensboro. Next, tap into your network of friends and colleagues for names of people who work in your target locales. Then network with those folks just as you would for a local job hunt. And of course, nothing beats actually spending a week or so in your highest priority city to really get a feel for the market.

See the following articles for more information:

- 60 Nontraditional Jobs You Can Do with a Law Degree \(and Should Strongly Consider Doing\)
- Twelve Sexy Things You Can Do With a Law Degree That \(1\) May Make You Famous and \(2\) Do Not Require Practicing Law
- LawCrossing's Guide to Alternative Careers
- Practicing Law Not the Only Option for Attorneys