Goat Terror: A hangover experience

Luckily because I am quite a sociable guy, I made a really good friend at university that invited me, and a couple of other students, to a house party in his home village. It was quite a long way from our university, but the party sounded wicked, so we went!

Now if you're a drinker you know that at a student house party, it can get a little crazy. Now this house party was extra crazy because my friend, the host, had a HUGE back garden, a swimming pool and was extremely rich (that was the impression). He provided an endless stream of alcohol! Anyway, I remember drinking A LOT, but the most vivid memory was playing "The drinking relay". Basically you put two tables opposite each other, about 15-20 meters apart and you line shots along each table, about 20-30. The objective is that you are against one other person, and must run back and forth; taking 1 shot each time you approach a table and be the last one standing.....

I woke up in the morning to a VERY PAINFUL biting sensation. Blood was running down the side of my face. I turn to my side and am now staring deep into the eyes of a goat! I was being attacked by a goat while I was unconscious! I jumped up screaming, realising I was in the garden. Feeling slightly violated I quickly stumbled away from the goat looking for a sign of life, as I wasn't the only person who had passed out in the garden. Finally I found people! A couple of guys were in the living room watching TV. It turns out that I had won the drinking game and to celebrate I broke into the next door neighbour's accommodation, which happened to be a farm, and dragged a goat to the party. I then threw up on the goat and nearly pushed him (I think it was a him) into the swimming pool, before collapsing. Some students took the goat back to the farm and locked him up, apparently. A theory is that this goat got back out, found me and started to eat me.....kind of. I am never messing with a goat again.

The main drive of this thesis is to understand what material factors influence the biological and environmental impact of emerging nanoscale transition metal oxide materials and to use this knowledge to redesign new materials to have reduced adverse effects. Emerging nanomaterials such as lithium nickel manganese cobalt oxides ($\text{Li}_x\text{Ni}_y\text{Mn}_z\text{Co}_{1-x-y-z}\text{O}_2$, $0 < x, y, z < 1$, also known as NMC) and lithium cobalt oxide (LiCoO_2 , $0 < x < 1$, also known as LCO) technology have increasing complexities to address technological needs. Large scale commercialization of these materials make them potential environmental contaminants through routes of manufacturing, usage, and disposal.

To evaluate the potential impact of nanoscale NMC and LCO on environmental systems, we first synthesized these materials using a two-step process that yielded control over morphology and chemical composition. These nanomaterials were characterized in parallel to biological studies to analyze changes to the surface and bulk composition and solution species. We identified that both NMC and LCO release transition metals in solution in an incongruent manner. Released Ni and Co ions were responsible for either some or most of the toxicity seen from the nanomaterial exposures. There is evidence that suggests the release of transition metals in high oxidation states such as Co^{3+} can cause hydroxyl radical formation and also contribute to observed toxicity. In order to reduce the observed biological impact seen from released Ni and Co, we synthesized NMCs with lower Ni and Co content. This redesign process lowered the toxicity for the gram-negative bacterium, Shewanella oneidensis MR-1. In these studies we learned that chemical composition of the nanoscale complex oxides are important in affecting the material's transformation process in aqueous matrices and this can ultimately impact toxicity. This thesis maintains that this chemical transformation insight is crucial in aiding the development of benign-by-design nanoscale cathode materials.
